Urban green spaces, such as parks, community gardens, and even roadside greenery, are increasingly recognized as critical components of healthy city living. Research consistently demonstrates that access to these natural environments significantly boosts the mental well-being of urban dwellers by reducing stress and improving mood. Furthermore, these areas encourage physical activity, from casual walks to organized sports, contributing to better cardiovascular health and combating sedentary lifestyles prevalent in cities. Beyond individual benefits, green spaces often serve as social hubs, fostering community interaction and a sense of belonging. They also play a vital ecological role by supporting local biodiversity and helping to mitigate some of the environmental pressures of urbanization, like air pollution and the urban heat island effect. Therefore, integrating and maintaining accessible green spaces is not merely an aesthetic choice but a fundamental strategy for enhancing urban quality of life and sustainability.
